

The product makes sense. The commitment doesn't — yet.

Cino makes its shared-payment model easy to understand and gives the user a clear reason to try it. But just before commitment, one important question remains unanswered: what will using it actually cost?

ROLE	LOOKING FOR
A person in a couple sharing regular expenses	A simple way to pay shared expenses with a partner without settling up afterwards.

02-EXECUTIVE-SUMMARY

The product makes sense. The commitment doesn't — yet.

Cino does a strong job of explaining an unfamiliar payment model. The page progressively clarifies what the product does, how it connects to existing banking, what the user needs to do and where it can be used. By the time the user reaches the lower parts of the page, the value is clear enough to make them want to try Cino. The remaining uncertainty is more specific: the user still wants to understand the pricing and conditions of using the service before committing.

Main observation

The journey gets the user close to a confident decision: the product, its value and its mechanics become clear, but the financial commitment remains less clear than everything else.

PAGES & SCREENS	KEY FINDING	READING TIME	SERVICE
Homepage	The user cannot find the pricing and usage conditions they want before committing.	≈ 3 min read	UX Review

03-OBSERVATION-01

The user cannot find the pricing and usage conditions they want before committing.

Cino explains the product model, its setup and its capabilities in considerable detail. But as the user gets closer to the decision point, they repeatedly look for information about commission, pricing and usage conditions. The question remains open through the CTA and into the FAQ.

At this point the user is not questioning the product's value anymore — they already want to try it. They are deciding whether the commitment feels acceptable. Without clear conditions, they have to make that decision based on an assumption that the service will probably be affordable.

The page succeeds in creating intent to try Cino, but the final decision still carries avoidable uncertainty. Making the core financial conditions clear before commitment would give that existing intent a more confident path to action.

06-CLOSING-THOUGHT

Cino already does the hard part well: it makes an unfamiliar payment model feel simple and useful.

The remaining opportunity is to give the same clarity to the decision itself.

When a user is already ready to try the product, they should not have to guess what the commitment will look like.

Make the core pricing, fees and usage conditions clearly discoverable before the user reaches the commitment point.